TREATMENT OF LOCKJAW. Dr. Dancan MacCalman Tells of the Drend Disease. (Baltimore Sun.) What will probably be the third case of tetanus, or lockjaw, within three mouths, was received at the Maryland leneral Hospital Sunday night. Two strongly-developed cases have been reated and cured at the hospital in a short time, the last being that of Samuel Yarrington, an 8-year-old boy, who ran a splinter into his foot on July 15th and was discharged as cured last Friday. The first case was that of John Galloway (colored), who stuck a nail in his foot white sweeping out a stable about the middle of May. The present case is that of Julian Thompson (colored), who, while at work Saturday at the Mt. Royal pumping station, stuck a nail through his shoo and wounded his foot. Last night Thompson was reported as having a very ugly-looking wound, although it is not yet certain that he has a case of tetanus.

The rarity of the disease, and the success in treating it at the hospital, have caused wide interest in the first two cases. Dr. Duncan MacCalman, superfutendent of the hospital, in speaking of locklaw and its care, said it is a very rare disease in this country, and is found mainly among young persons. "Tetanus is usually started from a wound, and the bacterial poison, which is the cause, principally affects the central nervous system," he said. The symptoms are peculiar. Generally the first is a complaint from the patient of a stiff neck, and he believes he has caught cold somehow.

"The popular name of lockjaw is derived from the contraction of the muscles of the face and jaw in such a way that the mouth can hardly be opened. This is usually the second symptom. Then, as the disease gets a stronger hold on the man, various muscles become affected. He experiences difficulty in swallowing because of the effect upon the muscles of the throat and larnyx. Sometimes the head is thrown far back because of the contraction of the muscles of the back, and this has the effect of curving the spine. the country which seems to omit no section, and which embraces all classes of people.

In a very remarkable article by former Senator Ingalls, he traces the sources from whence crimes orisinate, and shows that they are the result of a defeat of law which drives men to seek protection through other means, and out of which evolves the great troubles with which the newspapers of the country have been landen for some time past.
It will be seen that Mr. Ingalls is fair enough to acknowledge that in the troubilous condition of the present the South is the least of the offenders, and the most dangerous demonstrations come from the the result of organized effort in a vain appeal from the inefficiency of law. Tho escape, yet establish principles which govern the individuals in time to come and lessen crime. It is a pity that in the prospect opened up by this discussion there should be flaws and that the violations of law do not make mad either the ignorant masses nor let escape the obscure offender, but going further into the very precincts of the court-room, into the very sacred presence of the executive, such men, for instance, as Captain Carter can snap their fingers at courts and juries and walk the ground with all the freedom and indifference of innocence. When the verdict of a court-martial, presided by a commanding general of the American army in the field, finds an offender guilty, and that offender, stepping over the head of this judge, can find defence and delay and be enabled to bid defiance to those against whom he has offended, what are we to think if those lower down in the scale feel desperate and resort to desperate means? It is not the backwoods judge who is slapped in the face.

It is not the ignorant defendant who breaks loose from custody. If it were only this, we could afford to leave the remedy to the touch of time. But when we see a parody made of the court by those higher up in life; when we see a War Department official impose his presence between the court-martial and the convicted thiefy when we see a New York millionaire able to hold court in a back room and the judge compelled to give a verdict of divorce to suit his master, and that masker within a few moments consummate his foul conspiracy all through the channels.

within a few moments consummate his foul conspiracy all through the channels of law, it begins to look as if there are evils higher up in the scale to be attended to before we lecture the common masses, who can only reason from cause to effect
